Restructuring Work and Labour in the New Economy (RWL-INE) is an alliance of academic researchers and trade union partners involving eighteen scholars from ten universities working from the perspective of ten disciplines, eight union-based collaborators, and eleven trade union representatives from private and public sector unions and federations of labour. The Principal Investigator of this SSHRC-funded grant, under the Initiatives on the New Economy programme, is Professor Norene Pupo, Director of the Centre for Research on Work and Society (www.yorku.ca/crws).

The mandate of the Alliance is to study the social, political, and economic transformations associated with the new economy, to examine the institutional adjustments to the shifts occurring within the Canadian context due to globalization, and to explore the impact of these adjustments on the social and cultural experience of work. The goal is to direct new knowledge from this research toward changes in work structures and in policy-making in order to improve the quality and conditions of work and community life.

Researchers Wallace Clement, Andrew Jackson, and Linda Briskin are all members of the Restructuring Work and Labour in the New Economy Alliance. Their research featured in this issue of Just Labour has been funded through the RWL-INE. Further information about the RWL-INE can be found at (www.yorku.ca/crws/ine).
